“ Once upon a time, there was a boy who told his mother that he was going to be a river, and that his water would flow across the land at full speed. His mother replied that she would be the land that surrounded the river to guide its course. The boy, in his desire for freedom, exclaimed that he was going to be a bird that would fly as far as the wind. His mother was silent for a moment and then, with a loving look, said, “Well, I will put down deep roots in the earth and be a tree.” The boy heard this and understood that, despite his desire to fly, he would always have a safe place to return to. The roots of the tree would represent his mother’s love: an unbreakable connection and a home to which he could return, no matter how far he flew.”
